

Official thinks dredging won't be done in time

PROVO — Utah County Commission Chairman Keith Richan said he doesn't think the Jordan River will be dredged in time to help with flooding problems this spring.

Richan also said he thinks Salt Lake County should pick up the tab for most of the dredging, if the project ever becomes a reality.

Utah and Salt Lake counties have been working for months to get the Jordan River dredged.

The dredging is expected to release more water from Utah Lake and prevent some flooding along the river and lake.

Landowners around the lake have already lost thousands of acres of land to floodwaters and have filed a multimillion-dollar suit against groups they claim have been illegally holding water in the lake.

The Army Corps of Engineers had contracted to dredge the Jordan earlier this year with both counties chipping in $500,000 for the project. But Salt Lake County could never get water users in their county to agree to the dredging project, and the Corps finally withdrew its support of the plan.

Now the two counties are waiting to hear if the state Disaster Relief Board will give them $1 million to do design and engineering work on the dredging project.

"If we don't get an answer on this in the next week I doubt if the project will get done in time to do any good this year," Richan said.

The Legislature has also been asked to give financial support to the plan. Richan said Gov. Scott M. Matheson is leaning toward having the counties pay for part of the project. But Richan said he doesn't know if that is possible.

"That would mean the county has to come up with $2 million, and we have already spent $250,000 on the project," he said. "There just isn't any place to get the money."

Richan said Salt Lake County begins control of the Jordan River right at the edge of Utah Lake, and Salt Lake County would benefit from the water in the river. He thinks that means Salt Lake County should be taking the brunt of the financial responsibility for the project.

"They really have to assume some responsibility for this," Richan said.

Justice Durham, speaking at Brigham Young University's forum assembly, said a lot of lawyers practice law with a misconception of how state and federal courts interact.

Many people are surprised to find out that they are protected by two sets of constitutional rights, she said.

"One set is found in the Constitution of the United States and the other is found in the constitution of Utah," she said. "Lawyers who appear before us in the Utah Supreme Court often concentrate solely on definitions of those rights under the U.S. Constitution and pay surprisingly little attention to protections which may exist under the Utah Constitution."

She said the Utah Bill of Rights consequently remains

In explaining a state's Bill of Rights, Justice Durham said that for the first 80 years of its existence the federal bill did not apply to the actions of the state.

"This inattention to state bills of rights has, on occasion, in effect prevented full vindication of the constitutional rights of state citizens," she said. "The fact is that the individual rights protected by Utah's constitution or that of any other state may be significantly different from those protected by the Bill of Rights."

Justice Durham said that state rights not only provide enhanced personal rights and liberties to the citizens of particular states, but they may also bring about the eventual development of new national rights.

"Diversity, after all, is the hallmark of democracy and underlines the philosophy of federalism," she said.

Provo breaks ground for business park

PROVO — Groundbreaking ceremonies for Provo's new 420-acre business and research center, East Bay, were held Monday while the sun was shining, the band was playing, the golfers were golfing and the bulldozers were waiting in the wings, ready to start the park.

The new park is under construction in south Provo, adjacent to the present Timpanogos Golf Course, on top of the old city landfill and on a section of property that was once an LDS Church farm.

The city has been working for several years to develop the park.

When it's finished, East Bay will include a commercial, industrial and business center wrapped around a new 27-hole city golf course. The project is expected to create thousands of new jobs and bring in $1.7 million a year in property taxes.

Monday's posh ceremonies were at the present city golf course, which will be merged into the new course and park. While guests strolled around on the first tee and ate vegetables and dip, a jazz quartet played music and designers and city officials mingled with the crowd explaining the new development.

Gov. Scott M. Matheson was the guest speaker and officially broke ground. He called the project an important step for not just Provo but for the entire state.

"We need to broaden our economic base in this state and this park, a merger of the private and public, is an example of what we need to do," Matheson said. "We need diversification."

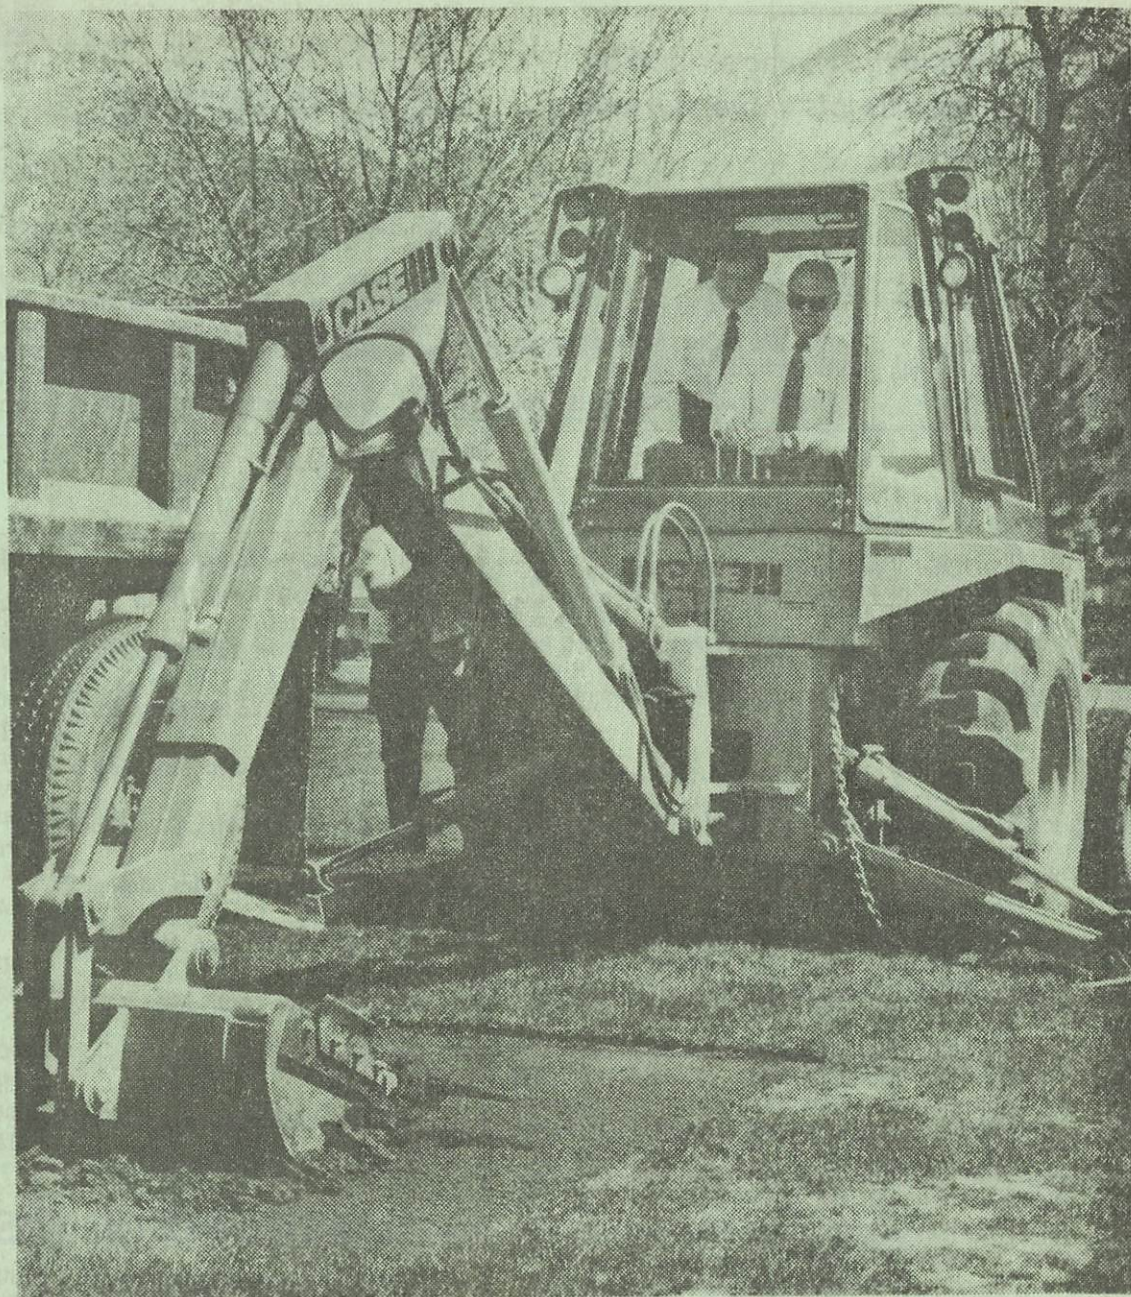

Matheson said the state decided to broaden business in Utah back in the late 1960s, when a move was made to work closer with the private sector. He said today the state's future is dependent on that move.

"We must never turn our backs on what we have now," he said. "At the same time we must also work to bring in new business."

Matheson also said Utah must look to a third source for its economic base — the international market.

"This state is a treasure-trove for tourism," Matheson said. "We need to bring more people in here who will spend the money."

beck and Linda Hayes are also helping with the play.

"The music for the play came from all over the place," said Mrs.
Vest. "We adapted some and wrote others."

Most of the colorful and elaborate costumes were made by the mothers, and money for the project comes from the PTA and parents.

"The fabric for the costumes was bought from a factory outlet store so we get the material cheap," said Mrs. Burgener.

The fourth graders also operate a student store in the basement of he school. Some of the profits help to pay for the play, she said.

"We also rent out the costumes to other schools who want to do the play," she said.
